The Iron Pirate By Max Pemberton.

By Max Pemberton.

All Control of the Control of th

tatement with wild interest. We were both young. I. Mare Strong, had spent most of my money, but Roderick was rich. We fitted out a steamship at once at our own cost and started across the Atlantic from Liverpool on an indefinite cruise for the purpose of get-ting news of Black and his golden ship, for we were both resolved to run the pirate to earth in one way or another. Mary, Roderick's young sister, insisted in joining us. As we looked on the rip in the light of a safe adventure own yacht and could all be trusted; but we were obliged to take on a few new men and a third officer. This officer. Francis Paole, an Italian, came to us well recommended. Before we had been at sea a week, however, I began to suspect, from various causes, that he was a spy of Black's. And I found reason, too, to believe he was trying to stir up discontent among the men.

About eight days after we had sailed. we awake one morning to find a thick blanket of fog enevloping our steamer, the Celsts. Suddenly, scarce a mile dis-tant, the roar of a big gun sounded. A moment later the fog lifted and I saw, away a mile on the starboard bow, a away a mile on the starboard bow, a spectacle which brought a great flush upon my face, and let me hear the sound of my own heart beating.

There were two great ships abreast of each other, and they were steaming with so great a pressure of steam that the dark-ereen wates was cleaved into two huge waves of foam before their bows, and the spray ran right over their forcastic and fell in tons upon their decks.

The more distant of the two ships was ineir decits.

The more distant of the two ships was long in shape and dark in color. She had four masts, upon which topsails and staysails were set, and two funnels painted white, but marked with the anenor which clearly set her down to be one of the famous Black Anchor feet. My powerful spy-glass gave me a full view of her decks, which I saw to be dark with the figures of passengers and crew all crowding to the port side, wherefrom the other ship was approaching her.
